

Watching this ELL lesson in Korea had me wondering how similar my friends' experience was in teaching ELL in Korea. At first I was quite pleasantly shocked with the quietness of the classroom, but once the game happened it was very engaging for the students. I noticed that the teachers worked very well together although they certainly could have been teaching two separate classes on their own. I also noted that having two teachers seemed to go very smoothly for this class, so it's certainly not a suggestion that these teachers ought to be teaching their own classes as much as it is a compliment towards their teaching skills. I also had a bit of a laugh after the song was sang (not very in tune by the American teacher), and not because the poor pitch, but because when students asked if they liked the song, they said yes. However, when they were asked if they wanted to sing it again, the response was a hard no.
